Text:

I would trot down this road sniffing on one side and then the other peeing a little here and there wherever I felt the urge having a good time what the hell* saving some because it's a long road but since I'm not a dog I walk straight down the road trying to get home before dark if I were a dog and I had a master who beat me I would run away and go hungry and sniff around until I found a master who loved me I could tell by his smell and I would lick his face so he knew or maybe it would be a woman I would protect her we could go everywhere together even down this dark road and I wouldn't run from side to side sniffing I would always be protecting her and I would stop to pee only once in awhile sometimes in the afternoon we could go to the park and she would throw a stick I would bring it back to her each time I put the stick at her feet I would say this is my heart and she would say I will make it fly but you must bring it back to me I would always bring it back to her and to no other if I were a dog

- "If I Were a Dog" by Richard Shelton, from The Last Person to Hear Your Voice. © University of Pittsburgh Press, 2007. Reprinted with permission.

From the Composer:

I own many different books of poetry from local writers to the legends we know and love which I reference to find the right texts for new commissions and projects. But Richard Shelton's wonderfully vibrant "If I Were a Dog" came from one of my occasional encounters with The Writer's Almanac, NPR's indispensable resource for downright great poems. I wanted to set this beautifully crafted gem without feeling fake, and I hope I've done it some justice.

Above all, don't take it too seriously or too lightly.
Deliver the text clearly and phrase as you would speak it. Don't go overboard with tempo shifts and let the piano bounce rather than tiptoe. No need to hit an audience over the head with a wink (e.g. measures 51-53) or something deeper (e.g. measures 67-70). In essence, let Shelton's words do the work and revel in the joy of a pet's unconditional love.
