I. THE FIRST SEA

The children are sorting the world of dreams
and speak of them in the morning, beginning to tell the real from shadow. The story line blurred, the edge of sleep and the wake of yet another storm.

We chart the world with every word we speak. I wish I could tell them there are no monsters of the deep, but that is exactly where to find them in the fears swimming deep inside
the cells of our bodies, or spiraling, one around another.

The mind a sail, the bed a vessel ready to transform
a pirate ship, a submarine, the belly of a whale.
With each new word they learn, one more memory will sink beneath the waves. Like swimming in that first sea, that grew smaller and smaller, as they already found ways to comfort themselves. On any morning, I find my daughter has traveled to yet another country, speaks a different language. Every dawn her world is new. She dreams the same dreams I do.

She may be falling, falling, running, or unable to run
when she needs to. I can't protect her there.
We grow further away all our lives. Language drifts us from those early waters, and our stories, long submerged, swim up years later. So many of these moments,

each a small Atlantis, will be covered by the sea
as language takes over, relegates the rest to dream.

2. COUNTING TWO

Suddenly my son can count

One. Twooo!

His one a calm, tame number

His two a wild creature,

the vowel stretching limbs,

traveling continents, oceans

taking on the world, in its primordial twos.

Three, four, five? my practical parent self suggests.

One, he answers authoritatively,

and then, again, the wildly gestured Twooo!

One. Twooo!

He counts the flock of birds

One. Twooo!

The cars on a passing train.

One. Twooo!

A march of ants. Drops of desert rain.

At night, exhausted from his exponential math,

his head against my heart,

counting beats perhaps

to fall asleep,

I fall with him,

thinking of his Twooo! his wildly gesturing hand,

showing me how well he understands

my little son

that two is so much more,

twice as much in fact,

infinitely more than one.

PROGRAM NOTE

The two poems of Charting the World, both written by contemporary poet Diane Thiel, share a common theme: the wonder of watching a child acquire a new language. In “The First Sea,” language opens new worlds to children, unfolding fears and dreams alike. In “Counting Two,” it’s an adult perspective that shifts as a child learns to count to two. In both poems, we travel to different worlds. We fall into a dream and name what we find as we fall into sleep. The mind transforms the world around us into a multitude of new adventures.

I don’t have children of my own, but I have delighted in caring for and teaching children for most of my life. A few years ago, of my young nephews went through a phase where he’d point at object after object, saying “This? This?” It was one of the only words he knew, yet he knew he could use it for nearly anything he discovered. He wanted to know what this was, and he wanted you to interact with it: to turn on the light switch, to open the cabinet. That phase lasted only a few months, but I still think about how one word summed up his wonder: this, and this, and also this. Charting the World describes that same sense of perpetual discovery. If we pay attention, one word or two can reshape our entire world.

Charting the World was commissioned by New Amsterdam Singers, Clara Longstreth, Music Director, with generous support from an anonymous donor.

PERFORMANCE NOTES

Chorus

- The solo from mm. 95-108 may be performed by any voice type.
- Within the ostinato from m. 97-102, the 3-part divisi between the soprano and alto lines may be split equally among those singers (e.g., some Soprano 2s may join the Alto 1s).
- A soprano note that dips below middle C may be omitted or mouthed without singing if the note is below a singer’s range.

Strings

- When a note is in parentheses after a glissando, slide to that note but do not rearticulate it.
- When a glissando is marked, use separate bow strokes unless the two pitches are slurred.
- Slide in pitch for the entire marked duration of a glissando.
- A dashed arrow marks a gradual transition between ord. and molto sul tasto (or molto sul tasto to ord.).
