Text and Translation

O frondens virga	O leafy branch,
in tua nobilitate stans	on your nobility stand firm sicut aurora procedit	as sunrise proceeds. nunc gaude et letare	Now be glad and rejoice, et nos debiles dignare	and find our weakness worthy.
a mala consuetudine liberare	free us from evil ways,
atque manum tuam porrige	and stretch out your hand
ad erigendum nos	to lift us.

From the Composer

Every time I notice a collection of leaves dancing together on the same breezy branch, I can't help but be mystified by their movement. Each leaf moving in its own, unique way, yet simultaneously swaying rhythmically connected to the others. Perhaps that's part of what is so captivating about Hildegard's music: that even 900 years later, it still perfectly encapsulates the feeling of searching for connections to our own spirituality through nature. As with any chant, the pace and rhythm should come from the feeling of the text. In this notation, each quarter-note head is given the pulse, with the diamond-heads moving faster, and the half and whole notes being held longer. Trills/shakes are notated as well. The short section of all parts singing text will benefit from rote speaking/response without pitches first to align things rhythmically. The key of the piece is flexible and should be adapted to the forces, acoustic, and overall program.

Biography

Hailed as "... inventive and compelling" by the Dallas Morning News, Chris Foss has been writing and arranging music for Cantus since he joined in 2008. Chris grew up in southwest Iowa and graduated from Millikin University with a BM in Commercial Music. After a short two years at the University of Nebraska directing the Vocal Jazz program and earning a graduate degree in Choral Conducting, Chris relocated to the Twin Cities and has been proud to be a part of Cantus since then. Chris has also taught voice at McNally Smith College of Music and composition at Concordia University - St. Paul. He spends his fleeting free time attempting to keep his dogs and children from jumping out of the canoe.
